On paper, Portland's winters were perfect - cloudy most days of the month. It turned out to be true, maybe 20 minutes at a time. Hardwick will shoot the scene from one angle and create another and it will rain, hail or the sun will come out, so it should be prepared with a plan B at all times. Each day, the call sheet will have at least three possible scenes that we could shoot every day. I had my list shot done two, sometimes three weeks, if not a month in advance. I'm storyboarding the most difficult scenes. We had a backup plan and a backup plan in terms of backup. Combined with the fact that the equipment, crew and actors are in remote locations in the woods, the weather has contributed to making the film a logistical nightmare, says Hardwick, who nonetheless fulfilled his schedule and budget. We didn't go for one day of shooting or post-production, she proudly points out. Advertising cast found unpredictable weather difficult as well. Taylor Lautner, who plays Jacob Black, still trembles in memory of filming a scene with Kristen Stewart on a cold beach. It was the worst weather I've ever had in trying to film a scene. It was the biggest problem for me, he says. But the itchy long wig he had to wear was not a picnic either: the hair was always getting in his mouth, he recalls. Most of the Twilight actors have undergone hair transformations. If you have blond hair you have dyed it brown. If you had brown hair, you dyed it blonde, says Peter Facinelli, who fell into this category. It took a good day at the salon, and with touch windows, it was high maintenance. He and his colleagues in the Cullen family - all vampires - also had to wear pale makeup. We had a week testing all different types of makeup, he recalls. They had a gadget from Japan, an ionizer, and as they put makeup on you, if they touched you, you get shocked. It'll wake you up! The actors playing vampires also had to contend with special contact lenses that reduced their vision. Ours were black with a hint of blood-red, recalls Rachel Lefebvre, who plays the villainous vampire Victoria. Wearing them: You don't have peripheral vision, so you can't walk down the steps yourself. You travel a lot. I completely fell once - it wasn't a stain. And I always end up jumping out of my skin because you can't see anyone coming near you. Lefebvre had a lot more fun with the film's stunt work, which included a wire installation called Magic Carpet, which creates the illusion that the actors are moving faster than normal speed. We rehearse in the warehouse. They started very slowly, at five miles per hour, then eight miles, then 10, then 12, and they kept increasing the speed. It was amazing, in fact, how to learn to walk again and again, that first you started on your knees. Landing was very difficult. You have to stay in these sick poses, but they will stop and you would like to move forward,' she says. But But You get it, it's a total rush. Not all of her co-stars share her enthusiasm for wire work, particularly the use of the aspect. It was painful for me, says Nikki Reed. It's like a 15-pound belt you tied and hooked up on cables. Then they lift you into the air and the camera is not ready, so you're cooling in the air, dangling all your weight. I just felt retarded.
